Chinese (Mandarin): World Language

Note that in Beijing and north-eastern China, the Mandarin languages are very similar to Standard Chinese, but not totally the same. So far we've got two out of the three things we need for Standard Chinese: grammar, from written vernacular Chinese, and vocabulary, from the various Mandarin languages. The final thing we need to add is the standardised phonology, which is based on Beijing Mandarin. Within the Mandarin language group is the version spoken in Beijing.
