Chromatographic Characterization of Stationary Phases for

The work presented herein summarizes the results of a chromatographic characterization study of HILIC stationary phases involving ten silica-based columns, including unmodified silica, amino, diol, anion exchanger, and zwitterionic materials, and a porous graphitic carbon (PGC) column.

Chromatographic, Spectroscopic, and Thermal

The chromatographic separation which results in severe peak broadening and tailing has been often attributed to the heterogeneity of the binding sites in the MIPs.

Oligomeric proanthocyanidins are potent antioxidants and disease-preventing agents. The efficiency of which depends on their composition and size. The degree of polymerization of proanthocyanidins is usually estimated by thiolysis then reversedphase high-performance liquid chromatography.

Chromatographic Techniques for the Characterization of

In liquid chromatography, peak profiles change with a variety of factors. For different reasons, such changes must be described. Symmetrical and non-overloaded chromatographic peaks are well described by the Gaussian model. Tailing or fronting peaks are, however, quite common in practice.
